PREFACE

This booklet is based on a lecture given to the Rogate Society on 18 November 1996. It is being published both by the Rogate Society, as an occasional paper, and by the Friends of Tuxlith Chapel, as Tuxlith Tract 5.

This collaboration reflects the ancient and enduring connection between the parish of Rogate and the chapelry of Tuxlith. For nearly a millennium much of the land in both jurisdictions has been united in the manor of Rogate/Bohunt, the Lords of the Manor being resident, for most of the last four hundred years, in or near Tuxlith.

The registers of baptisms, marriages and burials also show close links between Tuxlith Chapel and the residents of Rake and Langley in the Northern sector of Rogate parish. These links were given legal form when, in 1877, these hamlets were formally transferred, for ecclesiastical purposes, from the parish of Rogate to the then parish of Tuxlith (subsequently renamed Milland).

While it covers much from beyond the boundaries of Tuxlith, this study thus also includes material directly relevant to the history of people who worshipped at the Chapel.

WILLS AND INVENTORIES

The main groups of evidence available for 17th century Rogate are the parish registers, wills, probate inventories, rating lists, rent rolls and court rolls. In preparing this talk I have made most use of the probate inventories, and it is necessary to say a word about these before I proceed.

Up to 1858 the responsibility for administering wills and intestacies rested with the Church. If all a deceased's property was in one diocese, his executors sought probate from the officials of the bishop of the diocese. If his property was spread over several dioceses they went to the Provincial Court of Canterbury. If his parish was one of the few extra-diocesan parishes - quaintly called 'a peculiar' - they went to whoever was the superior authority; it might be a cathedral dean, or an Oxford college or even a lay individual. Mercifully Rogate was not a peculiar. In fact the bishops had long ago set up a network of ecclesiastical officers at convenient points around the diocese to deal with this specialist business. The executors and next of kin of deceased Rogatians merely had to make their way to the Probate Official in Midhurst. There, wills were proved, oaths taken, fees paid, guidance given and, from time to time, disputes resolved. Ultimately all the documents found their way down to the Diocesan Registry, and thence, centuries later, to the West Sussex Record Office in Chichester.

The wills and the inventories of the deceased's goods give a wealth of information about life long ago, but we have to put them in context. There are 85 inventories surviving from pre-1700 Rogate, all but one from the 17th century; most relate to wills, but some were called for in intestacies. I have not checked the Canterbury records, although I understand that not many inventories survive in Provincial Court files. In principle, if you were poor you didn't normally bother with a will, though you could, and one or two poor people in 17th century Rogate did. Where money was owed to the deceased, it was much easier for the next of kin to establish their claim against the debtor if there was a proven will or at least a formal grant of administration. This means that we do fortunately have a few inventories for quite poor people. There are two other important points about wills. Firstly, married women could not make wills, for the simple reason that they owned nothing. Widows, however, could and frequently did. In the circumstances of the 17th century it was very unusual for an unmarried woman to make a will, though we do have one such inventory - again where a claim to money owed to the deceased lady had to be established. The second very important point is that, in the 17th century, ownership of land was outside the jurisdiction of the Church. Land held under the various feudal tenures passed to a deceased's heirs under the feudal and manorial jurisdictions. This was not covered in the wills or inventories. Leased or rented land was however disposable by will and is mentioned in wills and inventories, as were the crops growing on all types of land. This is an important source of information about farming practice. That concludes my preliminary remarks.

AN AGRICULTURAL PARISH

Three hundred years ago, Rogate and Rake were virtually entirely agricultural communities. The only occupations we find quoted in the inventories not directly involved in farming are a blacksmith, a tailor, a wheelwright, a cobbler, a bucket-maker, an inn-keeper and a couple of carpenters. Even some of these had a pig or some hens or a few sheep. A number of other inventories relate to people who seem at the time of death to have no farming assets, but many of these may well be dependent or superannuated relatives of farmers with whom they were living. It should also be remembered that a decade or two earlier there had been quite substantial iron works in Harting Combe in Rake, involving a number of local people.

In 1624 the Overseers for the Poor, John Steer and Thomas Hews made a survey of the agricultural acreage of the parish. They identified some 54 holdings, some identified by the name of the property, some by that of the holder. The largest three were the Durford estate (120 acres), Mr Peter Bettesworth's estate, presumably Fyning (84 acres) and Edward Ford's holding of 70 acres - this was presumably part of Wenham manor, which had been conveyed to Peter and Benjamin Beconsawe some years earlier. Coming down sharply in size, the next three - all 36 acres - were Comblands in Rake, recently leased to Sir Peter Betsworth of Milland, Mizzards Farm held by Francis Shallet and a farm held by Nicholas Westbrook, gentleman. All the 54 holdings listed add up to under 900 acres - barely a fifth of the total area of the parish, which then, as now, was largely given over to woodland and heath. 21 holdings were of under 10 acres. A less exact survey had been carried out by the churchwardens, Roger Baker and Thomas Pannell in 1620. This was in 'yardlands', a rather unsatisfactory unit not of area, but of economic viability, one yardland being considered the smallest viable family farming unit. This was sometimes roughly equated to 30 acres, but is often considerably less or more. This list showed 38 holdings of a yardland or more and 12 others of between a quarter and one yardland. It then gives the names of 22 people designated as 'cottagers'. It would be interesting, if laborious, to attempt a detailed comparison of these two lists, but I have not yet been able to do so. Nevertheless, they seem to indicate the following state of affairs -

3 large farms
20 or so smaller but economically viable farms
50 or so small holdings and cottages, the holders of which would need to supplement their incomes in some way.

In what follows it must be borne in mind that the actual pattern of land use and possession was constantly changing year by year, and that any one farmer might well control extensive farmlands outside the parish.

I am going to concentrate now on the 20 or so viable farms, and I think it will help if we look first at an imaginary (but unrealistic) farm of, say, 30 acres - the traditional yardland - devoted entirely to arable crops. The farmer would leave a quarter or a third fallow each year, so let us assume he has a yield of grain from 22 acres. During the 17th century techniques and yields advanced considerably, but, for simplicity's sake let us assume a uniform yield of 15 bushells of grain per acre, 330 bushells all told. Of this, up to a third would be set aside to provide next year's seed corn, leaving 220 bushells. Up to 50 bushells was reckoned as necessary to feed a family in bread for a year, leaving 170 available for sale to meet all other needs. In the 17th century grain prices were very volatile, subjected to the vagaries of harvests and to all manner of market skulduggery. In 1620 a bushell of wheat fetched 2/9, the following year 4/4 and, in 1622, 5/8; the 17th century peak was in 1662 at 8/9, but in 1687 it was back down to the low 1620 price. Returning to our imaginary farmer, if he made 5/- a bushell - a fairly normal price - he would have a profit on the year of £42.10.0. The crucial question now is 'Is the farm rented at a commercial rent?' If it is, this would take anything from £15 to £30 or more. This would mean a lean existence, and, in years when the harvest is bad in Sussex but good elsewhere, things would be very tight indeed. On the other hand if he farmed his own land - albeit paying to the lord of the manor a quit-rent of a few shillings a year - he would be fairly comfortable. This was the envied estate of the Yeoman, much famed in English folk culture. Let us now look at one of the yeomen of Rogate, William Williamson.

YEOMEN

Mr Williamson seems to have lived at Slade, of which he held the freehold, and also farmed a holding called Woodstocks, and additional lands in the parish including a lease at a place called Hatchgate Mead. It is a happy chance for us that he died in 1634, in summer, when his crops were waving happily in the field waiting to be detailed in his inventory. At Woodstocks he had 8 acres of wheat, 9 acres of rye, 11 acres of barley. He also had 3 acres of wheat and rye, a fairly common mixed crop also called 'maslin'. This was used for a slightly coarse bread, often eaten routinely by the farmer's own family; 3 acres yielding 40 - 50 bushells is consistent with this interpretation. He also had 6 1/2 acres of oats, barley and peas, though it is not clear whether or not this was mixed, and 15 acres of peas vetches and oats and a mixed crop called 'dredge', normally barley, oats and peas, from which a very coarse flour was made. He also had half an acre roots, beans, hemp and flax - I think this is the only reference to flax being grown in this area. All told this comes to 53 acres of arable crops. Allowing also for roughly a third or quarter ground left fallow, this would make a total of about 70 acres arable.

In addition, however, Mr Williamson had quite a lot of livestock. 125 sheep and lambs would, under then prevailing practice, have needed about 50 acres; he also had 20 or so cattle, perhaps needing 12 to 15 acres. Five horses and two colts, 20 hogs and shuts - piglets under a year old - and eight bee-hives, and an assortment of geese, ducks and hens completed Mr Williamson's livestock. So far we are talking of about 150 acres - quite a large business though spread over separate sites, but this is not all for he also had quantities of marketable timber standing or in cords - cut timber in piles 8'x4'x4' - worth £6 - indicating several acres of woodland. Very interestingly, and again uniquely for the parish, at the time of his death he had, at property at Nyewood, a large quantity of marl, a type of soil rich with carbonate of lime and a valuable fertiliser, valued at the considerable sum of £14. This tends to confirm the impression that he was a progressive and effective farmer.

William Williamson made his will on the 14th July 1634 'sick and weak in body' and must have died almost immediately, as the inventory was taken on the 19th. He left a few modest cash legacies to his brothers and sister and their children, and all his house and farming assets to his wife, Joan, for her life, and then to his son-in-law Richard. Joan Williamson was still running the business several years later. There can be little doubt that Mr Williamson was a wealthy and significant farmer, and a major employer of local labour. His income must have considerably exceeded his outgoings, but, interestingly, there is no evidence that he had any financial assets at the time of his death. There are three possible explanations (1) that the inventory assessors simply didn't ask about them (2) that he was regularly ploughing all his surplus back into a rapidly growing business, or (3) that he was paying off debts incurred in the acquisition of the land. His cash legacies could presumably be met quite easily from the proceeds of the sale of harvest surplus a month or two after his death.

A yeoman on a somewhat smaller scale was John Hyde, who made a rather long and complicated will in 1657 and died in 1663. It is not clear where he lived but he seems to have farmed 9 acres at Nyewood and another property called Mill Marsh, presumably by the river, and also a small 13 acre farm, called Froukes Farm, all of them in Harting. He must also, however have had other lands. At the time of his death in April 1663 he had 13 acres of wheat, 5 1/2 of rye, 2 of winter vetches, 4 of peas, 5 1/2 of barley and 8 1/2 of oats - 40 1/2 acres under cultivation, say, 50 - 55 all told allowing for fallow. He also had four shuts, 9 sows with piglets, 8 cows with calves, 7 bullocks and six horses and colts. All the livestock is listed as 'in the gate', which may mean in the farm yard and buildings.

Mr Hyde had four sons, Edward, Francis, Richard and John, and a daughter, Margaret, and his will is a little unusual. For a start, it was made some years before his death, when he was in perfect health, and quite a lot of thought went into it. The unusual feature is that he grants to his son John the Nyewood and Mill Marsh holding, and to his son Richard the Froukes Farm holding, each on condition that they pay a yearly rent charge to the other son Francis - £1 per annum from John and £2 from Richard. Francis is given power to distrain if these annuities are not paid, but equally they would be voided if he were to try to sell or transfer them. The daughter Margaret is bequeathed the very large cash legacy of £60, reducing to £40 if she marries without the executors' consent. The inventory shows that, at the time of his death, Mr Hyde had £50 lent out on interest. It is always dangerous to speculate, but this looks rather like a carefully thought out scheme to protect the long term interests of a crippled son, Francis, by spreading the burden around the siblings but compensating them for it.

The main estate went to the widow Joan Hyde and the eldest son Edward, and, interestingly, we have the inventory of his estate at the time of his death 26 years later, in July 1689. He had apparently prospered, because it shows 86 acres under cultivation - more than twice what he inherited - plus a herd of over 30 cattle and a flock of some 50 or so sheep, indicating that he was probably farming some 150 acres in all. He also had £10.10.0 out on loan.

LIVESTOCK

It is worth mentioning at this point that mixed arable and pastoral farming was the norm in this part of the world. There are several reasons for this. Obviously it spreads the risks inherent in agriculture - you would be very unlucky to have both crops and herds failing in any one year. Also it provides for a varied and healthier diet for the farmer and his family and servants, and for their need for clothing fabrics, mainly wool and leather. But, at the most functional level, there was a natural symbiosis between livestock and crops as the former provided the principal and cheapest manure for the crops, which were, in their turn, necessary for keeping the animals alive in the long winter months. Soil management was beginning to be better understood in the 17th century - witness Mr Williamson's stock of marl. Lime was available in the area but extracting it and moving it about in large quantities was expensive. On the other hand it was relatively easy to move one's flocks and herds around, and dung carts and dung pots figure regularly in the farm inventories, much as slurry tanks are often seen - and smelled - trundling around our lanes now.

The economics of livestock deserve a moment's thought. It is said that the typical downlands sheep in those days would produce about 2lbs of wool a year. The wool of this breed was not considered very high quality and would fetch, say 8d to 1/- a pound, so Mr Williamson with his 125 sheep - a large flock for Rogate - might make about £12 a year from wool sales, far less than he could make from the same acreage if it were also suitable for arable use, which, of course, it may not have been. Lambs would also be sold every year, but these did not fetch much. There is no evidence of dedicated sheep farming in this area in the 17th century, or, indeed, anywhere in Sussex, and the main benefit of farming sheep was probably the contribution of their manure to arable yields.

Cattle were important to some of the yeomen of Rogate for several reasons, though Edward Hide's herd of 30 or so all told is one of the larger in the parish. Draught oxen were gradually giving way to the big shire horses as the principal mode of heavy traction on the farms - horses were much more productive. If a farmer used oxen, it was reckoned that he should yearly raise two ox and two cow calves for each plough. Grazing cattle were reckoned to need over an acre of grass each, though this could be reduced if they were kept in stalls and cut grass brought to them. The milk from one lactating cow could produce up to a hundredweight of cheese a year, and, as we shall see later, farmers' dairies - or 'milkhouses' as they were then called - seem to have been quite busy. The inventories record large numbers of cheeses stored in lofts, presumably often sold at the markets to boost cash flow at quiet times of the year. Given the market for dairy products, it often paid the farmer to wean his calves as early as possible. Steers for market were fattened on vetches, peas, beans or boiled barley, in addition to hay. This shews again the advantages of mixed farming and the interactions between its different branches.

Pigs have always been popular adjuncts to rural life, although no-one seemed to specialise in them in Rogate in the 17th century; 20 or so animals seems to have been about the maximum recorded. They had the advantage of eating almost anything and turning it into bacon. The inventories shew that many houses of all sizes had at least one flitch of bacon - or indeed a whole 'hog' of bacon - in their chimneys. Some pigs were kept in sties part of the time but they were often to be seen rooting about in the woods, or even in the highway.

Hens, ducks and geese also figure in many inventories, but most likely for household use. Costing next to nothing to feed and producing up to 180 eggs a year, each hen was a valuable asset to the household economy. Many of the farmers also kept bees; Mr Williamson, it will be remembered had eight stalls. At this time, of course, sugar, though available, was still fairly rare and very expensive, so honey remained the only generally available sweetener.

YEOMEN'S HOUSES

I am going to deal with the indoor life of 17th century Rogatians later, but, to take a short break from all this farming, we might look at what the inventories tell us of the houses of the two yeomen whose farming activities we have been looking at. Mr Williamson's house at Slade was clearly quite comfortable. The following rooms are mentioned in the inventory (1) The Hall - the term universally used in the inventories for the main living and dining room (2) the little chamber (ie bedroom) next the hall (3) the chamber over the hall - the master bedroom (4) the kitchen (5) the chamber over the kitchen - a small bedroom also containing five flitches of bacon (6) the bakehouse (7) the chamber over the bakehouse - two beds here (8) 'coploft' over the kitchen - an attic room used for storing grain (9) coploft over the hall - 28 cheeses stored here (10) the milkhouse (11) the cellar. In all there were four bedrooms and six beds.

Mr Hyde's accomodation was somewhat more sparse. He had seven rooms (1) the hall - also seemingly used for some cooking (2) his bed chamber (3) an inner chamber (4) a room 'within the hall' - apparently an additional bedroom - could this have been an arrangement for the son Francis? (5) the drinkhouse (6) the kitchen (7) the milkhouse. The house thus contained three bedrooms and four beds.

People's tastes and expectations in housing had been moving forward for a couple of generations at the time we are considering, moving from the wealthy down the social scale. West Sussex was not a particularly wealthy area - the yeomen of Kent were notorious for their affluence - so we would not expect Rogate to have been in the first league in this respect. Clearly, however, a number of stone farmhouses seem to date from this period, in most cases presumably replacing medieval timber-framed buildings. From Tudor times onwards, new houses were tending to be built with chimneys, and older houses being adapted to include them. There are certainly references to chimneys in several inventories - mainly as the repository for flitches of bacon - but there were probably still many cottages amd smaller farm houses that had not been modernised.

Glazing was also becoming increasingly common, though still out of reach of most of the poor. Wainscot pannelling was also quite popular and there are a number of inventories that mention it. I shall say more about the interiors of the houses later.

SMALLER FARMERS

Richard Cob, who died in 1637, described himself as a husbandman and ran a small farm, probably of about 50 or so acres. The inventory was taken in September, apparently after his crops had been harvested. His barn contained 56 1/2 bushells of wheat and rye (probably mixed as maslin), presumably for household consumption. The 20 bushells of peas, 80 bushells of oats, and £4 worth of dredge and barley were most likely intended as cattle feed during winter. He also had a flock of 53 sheep, and four cows, four oxen, two bullocks, two horses and a colt, seven hogs and two shuts and half a dozen hens. No monetary assets are listed in the inventory, although his deathbed will mentions cash legacies of £30. We know that he paid at least £6 a year rent for his property, and that he had one servant girl, to whom he left 10/-.

On the face of it he does not have much means of raising money, but was probably viable, though he and his two sons may have welcomed any additional work they could get. His house was a small, two story building comprising a hall, a chamber over the hall, a kitchen and a buttery.

Another husbandman was Joseph Tilly; he died in spring 1684. His crop for that year was still in the field and consisted of 9 1/2 acres of corn - what sort is not specified, though it was probably not wheat as he also had 9 sacks of wheat from the previous harvest valued at £8. At the then current price of about 5/- a bushell, this was about 30 bushells, more than would be needed for household consumption at that time of year. Within the house he also had small quantities of oats and vetches, (presumably as provender), wool, honey, buckwheat and malt, normally made from barley. As to livestock, he had a small flock of 19 sheep and lambs and two hogs, two cows, two calves and two 'heifer bullocks'. This last odd term crops up occasionally meaning a young female beast intended for fattening and the butcher. Mr Tilly also had 4 stalls of bees.

This gives an impression of bare adequacy, but, interestingly, at the time of his death, he had the not inconsiderable sum of £15 cash in the house, possibly earmarked for rent due at Michaelmas. The house itself, of two stories, consisted of a hall with a chamber above, a 'low chamber', and a kitchen, drinkhouse and milkhouse; lofts over the chamber and the kitchen were also used for storage.

THE INNKEEPER

Turning from all this farming, we come to something with which more of us are better acquainted - the pub. Inn-keeper Francis Massey's inventory is dated 11 March 1641, (1642 in the modern calendar). The natural question is 'Which inn are we talking about?' I can't answer this; the choice is probably between one in the village of Rogate, and the old Red Lion on the London Road at Rake. If forced to choose, I would opt for the latter, for two reasons, (1) the large amount of sleeping accomodation seems more appropriate to the main London Road [A map of Rake of 1632, shows the old A3 as 'London Way'.] and (2) one of the appraisers of the inventory is Richard Steer, and the Steers lived and farmed in Rake. Damp has taken its toll of this inventory, and many of the amounts are missing and some text, but there is enough to indicate that we are looking at quite a substantial business.

First, as to the accomodation; there are chambers - bedrooms - next the hall, over the kitchen, over the hall, next to the previous, a little chamber, two little chambers and a chamber over the cellar; eight bedrooms altogether, though apparently only two with fire-places, and only four chamber pots are listed in the inventory. In addition to the hall and kitchen there is also an 'old kitchen', the brewhouse, the wine cellar, the beer cellar and a coploft for dry storage. There is no bar as such, presumably casual drinkers were served in the hall or the beer cellar and staying-guests in their rooms. The contents of the beer cellar are quite impressive; there are four hogsheads full of beer. A hogshead is about 50 gallons or 400 pints, so that there are 1,600 pints waiting to be drunk. This tallies with the content of the coploft; there are 152 bushells of malt and small quantities of other things, including three bushells of last season's apples. In the wine cellar there were indeterminate quantities of sack and claret, but there is no reference anywhere to spirits or distillation. The kitchen is naturally well equipped, though, apart, possibly, from flagons there is nothing special. There are more than a dozen pairs of sheets, a dozen table cloths four dozen table napkins and commensurate quantities of other napiery. In the beer cellar there are 42 stone jugs and a dozen wine glasses. Mr Massey hardly had time to engage in farming but he did have three hogs and three shuts, and kept eleven hens. The three hogs of bacon in the cellar and the half-dozen or so eggs a day must have helped with catering. The spiritual man was not entirely overlooked, as the inventory also records the presence of a bible and other books.

The value of Mr Massey's clothes is missing as is the amount of money he kept, but, alone, I think, of all our inventories he is recorded as having a gold ring and a silver seal. Was he, perhaps, a slightly flamboyant character?

OTHER TRADESMEN

Most of the other tradesmen are rather less interesting than the innkeeper. The bucket maker, for instance, John Bridger who died late in 1683, has nothing in his inventory characteristic of his trade, apart from three guineas worth of undefined working tools. He had no monetary claims and no agricultural assets apart from a few bees. He had a two bedroom house with both a drink-house and a brew-house, but the contents were quite modest.

The wheelwright, was distinctly better-off. He was John Bolshom, who died in Spring 1640. His house had three bedrooms with hall, kitchen and buttery, and he ran a small farm along side his wheelwright business. At the time of his death he had five acres of wheat, 20 sheep, ten cattle, two horses, four hogs and poultry - probably 25 - 30 acres all told. The contents of the house give the impression of plenty - 22 pewter dishes, 18 spoons, 36 trenchers (wooden plates); even four flitches of bacon 'with some of the offal'! I was reminded in perusing this inventory of Mrs Mavis Budd's book, describing the life of her grandparents, who combined farming in Iping with making wheels, in a way of life which had probably changed little from the days of John Bolsham.

We have record of two tailors, Henry Smith and Peter Pack, who died in 1631 and 1641 respectively. To deal with the latter first, he had a two bedroomed house with hall, kitchen and buttery. Very unusually, the inventory records that the house was worth £80 but mortgaged to William Browman of Trotton for £16.8.0. The contents of the house look very modest, although much of the text of the inventory is damaged or missing. Unusual items are bibles (in the plural), a sword, scabard and belt and, for his trade, two pressing irons. No land is mentioned, though he does have a barn containing 12 bushells of wheat and 32 bushells of oats.

Henry Smith is rather more interesting and affords us one of our rare intimate glimpses of life then. One room of his house is furnished as a shop, containing a shopboard (presumably a counter or cutting table), three shelves, a 'nest of boxes', a pair of sheers, two pressing irons and a desk. No stock of fabrics, or accounts due are listed, which seems odd, though he did have £10 cash. Apart from the shop, the house has a hall - though this is furnished as a master bedroom - a chamber over the hall, and a well-equipped buttery and kitchen. Listed as in the kitchen are a bible and a hog. Apart from the latter, he seems to had no farming or horticultural activities.

In the spring of 1631, Rogate suffered a visitation of the plague. In March and April of that year there were 19 burials, compared with a normal two or three. Henry Smith had the melancholy task of burying one of his household, who had died of plague. Shortly after, he realised he was feeling unwell, and not having time to make a will, on the 10th April, he made a declaration before his wife, Anne, and brother-in-law, Christopher Wall, the declaration being subsequently proven as a nuncupative will. (Normally four witnesses would have been needed, but one imagines that the Church must have recognised a certain reluctance of people to be witnesses to victims of the plague.) Mr Smith was buried on the 13th April.

He left to Christopher Wall, his brother-in-law, his best cloak, and to his kinsmen John and Benjamin, his best suit and his gold ring respectively. It may be recalled that plague was thought to travel in clothing, so these bequests may have been received with mixed feelings. He also left £6 to his brother Richard '...for the £3 he lent me long since, for soe was my promise to him, that yf I dyed worthy of £6, he should have soe much.' He also assigned a debt of £7 due to him on bond to some men to whom he owed the same sum. We then have, uniquely in all these cases, a record of his exact spoken words, 'I pray, wife, see this performed; and there now is my will made.'

Two men appear to have been carpenters, although the appraisers of the inventories did not give them any description. Peter Bridger died in Autumn 1697. Apart from clothes worth £1, and £2 owing to him, his assets were limited to a stock of timber, 60 thellows (a rare word which might be either 'tillow' a young oaktree, or, more likely 'theale' a board or plank), 34 spokes, 5 axes, various small pieces of timber and 31 plough beams and thills, ie axle beams. At the time of his death, he had a brother, Giles, and two daughters; his total lack of domestic property must suggest that he was lodging with relatives.

The other carpenter was William Hedgecock who died in the winter of 1690. He had a kitchen, a 'best chamber' and an 'old chamber'. an odd combination which may suggest that he was living in rooms in the house of his daughter Elizabeth, wife of Francis Vengham. His rooms were adequately furnished, but the inventory mentions no stock of food or drink apart from one brandy bottle. He had no agricultural assets but he did have 120 thillows, axes and £5 worth of timber in the yard. He was also owed upon bond the considerable sum of £91.

The village blacksmith is of particular interest because we have three generations of inventories - John Grist I, died 1656, John Grist II, died 1689, and John Grist III, died 1734 (out of the period of this study). In John I's time the establishment was quite modest - a shop, a hall, two chambers a kitchen and a bakery (this last-named equipped as a brewhouse). He also kept a flock of 60 sheep, one fat hog and two shuts, and three stalls of bees, but otherwise carried on no agricultural activities. The furnishings and equipment of the house are adequate, but not indicative of any surplus wealth, and, unexpectedly for an important tradesman, no book-debts are recorded. The equipment in the smithy is what one would expect - a pair of bellows, a vice, hammers, an anvil a bench - and there are also £8 worth of iron and £3 worth of coal.

By the time of the death of John II in 1689, things had much improved, indeed the total of his assets - £434.5.2 - is, over the whole century, second only to that of the Bettesworths, though others' would have been understated by reason of the exclusion of land. John II has four bedrooms, two with curtained beds, one of which also has a fireplace. Stored away in various places are six bushells of apples, one and a half hundred weight of cheese, nearly a hundred-weight of butter, three dozen table napkins, nine pairs of sheets, 48 bottles, nine barrels etc etc. Compared with John I's household, the general impression is of slightly excessive comfort. Outside, in the wood-house, are two cords of wood and three hundred faggots. In the 'sheeling' - a simple garden shed - are nine bushells of charcoal and various wooden stands. John II retained his father's flock, now of 97 sheep, and increased the bees to six stalls. The tools of the smithy seem to be much what his father used. The great difference is that he is owed £49.10.0 on 'the shoop booke', and the huge sum of £287 upon bond, though, sadly we are told nothing about who owed this.

For the sake of completeness, we may note some aspects of the inventory of John III in 1734. His financial assets amount to £68.16.6 and his total assets to £108.2.2 - clearly a sharp drop from his father's prosperous state. The inventory is not broken down room by room, though over all it doesn't look very extensive. The list of the contents of the blacksmith's shop is detailed and, one would imagine, of interest to specialists in this field.

WIDOWS

As explained at the outset, married women normally had no independent estates and therefore had no need to make wills. We do however have one inventory for a married woman, Anne Reeves (nee Triggs). At some stage she had lent to her brother, Richard Triggs, £10. On her death, in 1646, the widower, William Reeves, had to go to the probate officer to establish his claim to this £10. The inventory contains this single item: all else was already his.

One sixth of all the inventories in this collection relate to the estates of widows. The freedom to dispose of one's assets must have one of the more notable consolations of viduity. The smallest of all these inventories is that of Joan Colpis, who died in 1680. Her tangible assets - clothes, a bit of pewter, fire-irons and little else - amounted to £1.10.0. She was owed in 'desprat doos' (ie disparate dues = sundry credits) £2.0.0, the recovery of which was probably the sole reason for the inventory. The absence of all the essentials of living presumably implies that she was living with, and looked after by, her family.

Joan Puttock, a widow who died in 1633, seems to have been living by herself in a two chamber house with hall, kitchen and buttery. Her chattels came to £7.11.3 and she was owed £2 on bond. She prefaces her bequests with a rather pathetic introduction '...and as for that poore estate wherewith it hath pleased God to bless me withall, if anything remayne at the time of my death after my debts be paid and funerall expenses discharged..' Apart from three hens, she had nothing that could support her life, so she must also have been looked after by relatives and friends, presumably the half-dozen or so who were bequeathed portions of her meagre chattels.

Anne Bettisworth, mother of Mr Peter Bettisworth of Fyning, died a widow in 1630. The linen and furniture in her chamber in her son's house were considered hers, as were £10 worth of clothes. Her main asset however was £88.5.0 'due to hir by hir booke of account'. She left a large number of small legacies to family and servants, including several cash sums to people 'to make them rings' - presumably mourning rings.

Margaret Brooker, who died an independent widow in 1630, led quite an interesting life. Her first husband, Richard Lutman, seems to have lived in Rake, and her three sons, Nicholas, Thomas and Richard, were baptised in Tuxlith Chapel, where she was married for a second time, to Peter Brackstone, in 1594. The three Lutman sons and their families continued to figure in the Tuxlith registers for the first half of the 17th century, and Margaret left the poor of Tuxlith 5/- in her will. She was widowed a second time, but again remarried, only to be widowed for a third time, after which she called it a day. She had no children after the three boys. At the time of her death she seems to have been living with family - probably her youngest son Richard - with a formidable accumulation of chattels. She had, for example, 27 pewter dishes and a host of kitchen equipment. She was obviously comfortably off and her will lists four servants. The fact that two of the Steere family were witnesses and overseers to her will may suggest that she was living in Rake, near her other sons. At the time of her death she was owed £50 by her youngest son Richard, and £10 by Richard Cover.

THE POOR

Before leaving the individual inventories, we might look for a moment at one or two examples of people who seem to be hard up. Edmund Clement, who died in 1623, was the brother of William Clement who farmed the large Durford Farm. Edmund had what seems to have been a small amount of land and a house at Chalton, but, possibly, to have lived at Durford with his brother; the inventory is not clear on this. The inventory, for a total of £10.15.8, makes rather melancholy reading; it includes '3 bushells of barley which was

At the time of his death in 1645, Peter Rudman alias Mason - the alias may possibly indicate his trade - had eleven debtors totalling just over £30 the largest individual sums being £5. Most can be recognised as names of farmers within the parish. An interesting case is also Richard Braye the elder (died 1623) who had nine debtors including Sir Peter Bettisworth £20 with the interest. Richard Braye had been named in the 1591 as one of those responsible for causing the deforestation of Harting Combe to provide fuel for the furnace in the Combe producing iron. Sir Peter was a co-venturer in this, having secured a 99 year lease on much of the woodland in the Combe. Richard Braye was owed a total of £80 by debtors as far afield as Petworth and Northchapel. It seems possible that he made a good sum out of the iron business and was able to live on it thereafter; his inventory shews a large well-equipped house but no agricultural activity.

Many inventories refer to loans as assets of the deceased, but so few identify debtors that it is dangerous to generalise. However the following patterns seem to exist -

1. Intra-family loans were quite common,
2. Poorer people lent surplus cash to better-off farmers,
3. The better-off farmers lent amongst themselves and to gentry.

Much of this lending was probably of the nature of investment by the lender rather than personal financial assistance to the borrower.

THE HALL

Turning now to the domestic side of life, virtually every house had a hall, in theory the main living room, sitting room, drawing room and dining room combined. It is notable, however that quite a few inventories show no hearth and fire-place paraphernalia in the hall. Where, as in most cases, the house has a kitchen, with a continuous fire in place for cooking, the kitchen may well have been the main focus of day-to-day family life, the hall being kept for 'best' (it may be recalled that 'focus' is the Latin for 'hearth'.). For example there is the hall of Richard Triggs (died 1689); this contained a table, a form and four chairs, and seven dishes, three candlesticks and a flaggon, all of pewter, and a few books. It doesn't look very lived-in. The hall of Richard Blackman (yeoman died 1644) held merely one cupboard, two forms and a chair and was presumably little used. Similarly, Richard Cob (husbandman died 1637) furnished his hall with two tables, four join-stools and an old chair; and John Bolsham (wheelwright died 1640) had in his hall a cupboard, a table, a bench, a form, three chairs, a little table and a piece of wainscot. (Wainscotting, which we might regard as a fixture, was seen as a relatively recent luxury and listed as a chattel.) Richard Bridger (died 1620) seems to have had a mediaeval two-room house - hall and chamber, no kitchen. His hall therefore contains all the paraphernalia of the kitchen. The hall of Anne Ayling (widow, died 1640) is an example where a second hearth is furnished, apart from the kitchen. The hall hearth has two pair of brandirons, a pair of tongues, a fire-pan and a pair of pot-hangers.

THE KITCHEN

When the kitchen is in full use, its contents tend to fall into three groups (1) hearth and cooking equipment (2) stocks of food and feeding equipment (3) other bits and pieces. If we look at the contents of the kitchen of John Bolsham (the wheelwright who died in 1640), we find this exemplified, thus -

1. Hearth and cooking: a furnace, three brass kettles, iron pot, iron pan, trivet, dripping pan, frying pan, skilletts, pothangers, pothooks, fire shovel, fire tongs, brandirons, spits, gridiron, butter churn

2. Food and feeding: pewter dishes, sauces, spoons, salt cellar, 36 trenchers, wooden platters, a flitch of bacon, a quantity of beans,

3. Other: candlesticks, a chamber pot, tun, troughs, kivers, tubs, vats, buckets, lantern and spinning wheels.

THE HEARTH

So important was the hearth to all houses, even down to the poorest, that it is worth dwelling for a moment on its furniture. It seems that virtually all cooking in the 17th century was at open fires - normally wood fires on stone bases. Chimneys were coming into fairly general use during the early years of the century, which must have made halls and kitchens much pleasanter places. The first essential pieces of equipment were the two andirons, also called angiers, fire-dogs and brandirons. The ends of burning logs rested on the horizontal bars of the andirons, and at the backs of the front vertical bar were matching brackets at various heights, across which could be placed a spit, also termed a 'broche' or 'broach'. Under this, in front of the fire, a dripping pan could be placed, when necessary, to catch the drips of fat from the rotating joint. Behind the fire would often be a decorative iron fire-back to radiate heat.

Firmly bedded into the wall or the top of the hearth recess would be found one or two iron pothangers, generally capable of swivelling horizontally. At the end of the arm of the pothanger would be a pot-hook - a small iron bracket with hooks at various heights, from which pots, cauldrons and kettles could be slung. Towards the end of the century a new gadget begins to appear in the inventories; this is the 'cotterel', a variable height pot-hanger adjusted by a lever.

For open-fire cooking, most pots and cauldrons tended to have rounded bottoms, three short legs to give stability when standing and also to enable them to be rested directly on the fire when needed, and iron handles from which they could be suspended from the pot-hook. (I have said 'iron', but there were also large numbers of brass utensils.) Also suspended from the pot-hanger, often on a permanent basis, would be a brass or iron kettle with a continuous supply of hot water. This would have either the usual spout or a tap at the base. Frying pans appear in most kitchen inventories, though their use on open fires meant that many had much longer handles than we are used to. A small utensil, which has more or less disappeared from modern kitchens, is the skillet or posnet, a small saucepan with three longish legs and a long handle; with this, small quantities of milk or broth or whatever could be quickly heated directly on the fire.

Toasting irons are mentioned from time to time; these were low metal stands upon which slices of bread were placed vertically and pushed up close to the fire. Gridirons were also very common, either with handles, resting directly on the fire, or slung from the pot-hanger. Trivets, normally 'trifts' in the Sussex dialect of the age, and chafing dishes are also abundant. Many inventories mention 'furnaces'. These were presumably closed ovens, normally in the hearth recess, where higher temperature enclosed cooking could be carried out, possibly using charcoal. Bake ovens built into the walls became common during the course of the century, but, naturally are not mentioned in inventories.

'The Country Kitchen' by John Vince published by Sorbus

Tongs, fire-shovels, pokers, fire-pans, bellows, bundles of drying herbs, flitches of bacon and a salt box probably complete the picture of a 17th century Rogate kitchen hearth.

OTHER OFFICES

All but the smallest cottages, could boast one or several of a buttery or milk-house, a brew-house or drink-house and a bakery. The distictions between the specific functions of these rooms and the kitchen itself are not always observed. Some of the equipment - tubs, buckets, vats etc - was probably multi-purpose, anyway, and it is by no means uncommon to find, say, firkins in the buttery or milk-trays in the bakery. It is sufficient just to give a flavour of some the types of equipment mentioned. Powdering troughs and salting troughs were essential for salting and preserving meat for winter use. Various types of tubs, vats, tuns, bushells and half bushells, kivers (a shallow cross between a tray and a tub), are all found as are, barrells, firkins, bottles, stands for barrells, butter churns, cheese presses, searces (sieves), sacks, gallon and half-gallon measures, and countless other bits and pieces, disregarding whatever might be included in the assessors' catch-all 'other lumber'.

AND SO TO BED

Candlesticks and lanterns are mentioned in many inventories, and doubtless the humble tallow taper was much used, particularly amongst the poor. In the evenings there was little to do other than to sit chatting by the fire with a mug of ale or to go to bed. It made sense to rise and retire with the sun. Lacking the temptations of televisual torpor, the 17th century Rogatian probably thus spent more time in bed than his 20th century descendant. Beds and bedding were very important and occupy a prime place in wills and inventories.

At the start of the century there were still elderly reactionary voices bewailing the decadence of feather beds, coverlets, bed curtains and the like, and harking back fondly to the times when a straw mattress on the floor was good enough for anyone. But the battle was lost; it was a poor house which did not contain at least one feather bed, though servants and children often had to make do with flock mattresses - stuffed with offcuts of cloth - or occasionally mattresses stuffed with chaff. Feather bolsters and pillows often go with the feather-bed, and some households seem to have had more sheets, blankets, coverlets and pillow-cases (often then called pillow-bears or pillow-coats) than they could have needed. The master bed was probably normally a solid, permanent, craftsman built piece of furniture, and so might be some others, but there were also large numbers of truckle beds, which could be taken down or folded up and put away.

And there let us leave our 17th century forbear, earnestly saying his prayers for good health and good harvest, sinking into his feather bed, snuffing out his taper, and seeking, for his tired limbs, refreshment, and, for his anxious mind, oblivion, in the all-embracing darkness of night.

TRANSCRIPTS OF PROBATE INVENTORIES

NOTES ON THE TRANSCRIPTS

1. The prefixes 'ITEM' and 'IN PRIMIS' are generally omitted.

2. For the purposes of clarity, items have been grouped and spaced, but the sequence of items has not been altered.

3. The original spelling has been retained.

4. Expressions of number and amount, and Roman numerals have been normalised into modern Arabic numerals.

5. The Probate Official's annotations to the inventories often contain references to the deceased's next of kin. As these can be of use to researchers, they have been included, but the routine text of the annotations has not been repeated.

6. Passages in the inventories which have been struck-through, although still legible, are shewn in this form.
